Copying, rather than purchasing cast copies, and/or failure to pay royalties is a federal offense. Cheating us and our wonderful playwrights in this manner will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law. Please support theatre and follow federal copyright laws.

COUNTING RITA

CAST: RITA and SARAH

SCENE: A café. SARAH sits at a table, sipping a soda, waiting patiently. RITA arrives, hurried.

RITA: Hi, Sarah. Sorry I'm late. (SARAH takes a small handheld counter out of her purse and clicks it once. In competition, the counter can be mimed, and SARAH will say "click" each time the counter is clicked.) What's that?

SARAH: A counter.

RITA: Why do you have a counter?

SARAH: It's an experiment. Not a big deal, really. Will it bother you?

RITA: No, I guess not.

SARAH: Is something wrong? You look flushed.

RITA: Wrong? No. My guitar lesson ran late, that's all.

(SARAH clicks the counter.)

SARAH: How are they coming?

RITA: What?

SARAH: The guitar lessons. You must be getting pretty good by now.

RITA: I still have a long way to go. I need to practice more.

SARAH: I'd love to hear you play sometime.

RITA: Oh, I'm still horrible... I'm so glad you called. I've been thinking a lot about you.

SARAH: Have you?

RITA: We've kind of lost touch lately.

SARAH: I know what you mean. Whatever happened to being joined at the hip? Movies with the gang, concerts. You weren't at Jeremy's party, and then I hoped you would come apple picking with us and Caroline, but you vanished again. You've been almost invisible.

RITA: I've been so busy. Too many papers to write. Lots of time at the library. I've been working too many hours at the store. Suddenly it seems like I never do anything fun. (SARAH clicks the counter.) Why are you doing that?

SARAH: I told you, it's an experiment. I'm trying to understand something.

RITA: About speech, about conversation? It's really annoying to have this little clicking in the middle of... What is this all about?

SARAH: I'm sorry it's bothering you. I know you like things quiet, inside and out.

RITA: What is that supposed to mean?

SARAH: Nothing.

RITA: See, that's something I don't like. It's very condescending when you do that. That tone of voice. Like you know so much more than me. I know you're smart, we all know you're smart, Sarah. But...

SARAH: You're mad at me.

RITA: No, I'm not... How could I be? You're sweet, you mean well. I'm insecure, that's all. (SARAH clicks the counter.) You're not going to stop that, are you?

SARAH: No. It's really helping me. It helps me pay attention to what you're saying, deeply. I deeply want to understand you, Rita.

RITA: And that little clicker is going to help?

SARAH: Sort of.

RITA: You've been so weird lately.

SARAH: How would you know? You've been avoiding me.

RITA: I have not been avoiding you. We've just been missing each other. (click) But I've heard from the others that you've been acting different.

SARAH: Who? What have they been saying?

RITA: You seem like you're some sort of odd mental whirlpool. One minute you're laughing, and the next you're in a deep depression. You wonder off in the middle of a conversation. You act like you're suspicious of everyone.

SARAH: I didn't think I'd been acting any differently.

RITA: People have noticed. I talked with Julie about you. She has a theory.

SARAH: Enlighten me.

RITA: She thinks you're in love. And not with Jake.

(SARAH clicks the counter, laughing.)

SARAH: Is that what she said?

RITA: Even Jake is curious. He says you've seemed kind of distant.

(SARAH clicks the counter.)

SARAH: You talked with my boyfriend about me?

RITA: Just in passing.

(click)

SARAH: And he thinks I'm interested in someone else?
